Crown/Material witness in Central Europe: Slovak Republic, Czech Republic and Austria. Part 1.¹

The authors provide in the present first part of scientific research a detailed analysis of legislation of the crown witness in Slovak Republic, Czech Republic and the Republic of Austria. They focus on topics such as context of adopting the legislation, range of offences, subsidiarity and proportionality and obligations of the crown witness. From analysis of the findings, authors recommend what factors the legislator should consider in legal regulation of the crown witness.

1. Introduction and historical context

The purpose of the crown witness² institution is to strengthen effective detection of serious criminal activity, especially organized crime committed by criminal groups in a sophisticated and secretive manner, and to strengthen the detection and conviction of the offenders by motivating the suspected or accused persons to testify as witnesses. The basis of this institution is an agreement between the offender and the state (represented by the public prosecutor's office or the prosecuting attorney's office) on the provision of information essential for the investigation of serious crime, i.e. identification and detection of the perpetrator, which the cooperating person benefits from. The concept of providing benefits to the cooperating person is based on the idea of "the negotiated justice"³, when the person provides information to the law enforcement authorities that they would not otherwise have obtained, or provides testimony that constitutes at least material evidence (the cooperating accused person is therefore also called a material witness⁴ or “pentito”), the absence of which would mean the insufficiency of evidence, i.e. this concept is also included under the concept of extensive, or pragmatic opportunity⁵. The cooperating person benefits from the provision of information by the award of a more lenient punishment or complete impunity for a criminal offense in the form of the termination of criminal prosecution. The nature of this cooperation as the negotiated justice is particularly pronounced in the conditions of the Slovak criminal procedure, which does not require initial initiative nor admission of the actual criminal activity by the cooperating person but only the provision of information and testimony as a witness in the proceedings. In contrast, initial initiative as well as admission of crime is required in the conditions of the Austrian criminal procedure, which can be regarded as an external feature of the abandonment of criminal behavior (a sign of desistance), and the benefits provided to the crown witness can therefore be perceived as the extension of possibilities of individualizing the punishment⁶ - similarly as taking into account the admission as an attenuating circumstance.

¹ This article has been prepared within the APVV (Slovak Research and Development Agency) Project (No. 15-0740) entitled as the Guidelines and tools for effective elimination of unlawful acts in relation with potential insolvency.

² In the text, the terms "crown witness" or "material witness", "cooperating person" and "cooperating accused person" are used as synonyms. The term "cooperating person" is explicitly used in the case that no criminal prosecution is conducted against the person as the accused.

The criminal procedure of the continental nature in the Central European region originally had an inquisitorial character, with the dominant position of the judge⁹ and the imperative of seeking material truth¹⁰. Crown witness, on the other hand, is a rational instrument of a strictly contradictory process that prefers efficiency and effectiveness rather than seeking material truth, i.e. the fair punishment of every offender, that is, even the cooperating one¹¹. Following the inclination of the continental legal systems to the accusatory criminal procedure with contradictory elements, the crown witness instrument also finds its place in here, even though the criminal procedure in these systems does not constitute the process of two opposing parties in the true sense of the word. The crown witness institution can be regarded as one of the symbols of departure from the principle of seeking material truth. In Slovakia and the Czech Republic¹², this principle is no longer applicable, while in Austria it is still part of the criminal procedure¹³.

Unity between multiple legal system can be found at the level of purpose, although individual legal standards differ. In the following text, we will examine how three Central European legal systems have coped with the introduction of the original Anglo-American legal instrument, namely, and in particular with the determination of the extent of criminal offenses to which it applies, with the issue of the duties of and the "benefits" for the cooperating person, as well as with the possibility of using the information obtained as evidence in proceedings against a third party.

2. The context of adopting the legislation in Slovakia, the Czech Republic and Austria

The crown witness legislation is relatively new in all three countries, given the historical and systematic context. Legislators decided to introduce the crown witness legislation after considering the inadequacy of the procedural tools used so far in detection and conviction of offenders, particularly organized crime and other sophisticated crimes. The Slovak Code of Criminal

¹³ According to Czech and Slovak legislation, the authorities proceed to see the facts of the for which there are no reasonable grounds for doubts to the extent necessary for the decision.

Procedure (CPC)¹⁴ includes legal instruments related to the application of a crown witness¹⁵ from December 2003, and more specifically from January 2006¹⁶. The reason for introducing such legislation, according to the legislators, was to overcome the insufficiency of evidence, especially in cases of organized crime. Motivating a “criminal offender” to voluntarily cooperate with law enforcement authorities, i.e. to conclude a formal agreement on benefits in return for witness testimony, appears to be a more effective tool for detecting information than conventional procedural tools.

Similarly, in the Czech Republic, the issue of the crown witness was gradually incorporated into the Code of Criminal Procedure (CPC)¹⁷: in 1995 and in 2009, by the amendment related to the adoption of the new Criminal Code (CrC)¹⁸.

The reasons for the adoption of the legal status of a crown witness in Austria are, in principle, the same as in the Slovak and the Czech Republic: the clarification of serious criminal activities committed by criminal groups in particular. In addition, the legislation also pursues the effect of general prevention - the destabilizing effect on organized crime groups¹⁹. Each chain is as strong as its weakest link, and a cooperation agreement with one member of the group breaks the chain, which in other groups of organized crime leads to mistrust among members, motivating each member to pursue primarily his or her own interests, which hereby leads to the weakening of the groups.

The specificity of the Austrian legislation, which is unknown in the Slovak and Czech criminal procedure, is the temporal limitation of the crown witness legislation to a primary six-year period, followed by a five-year period, after which there will be a room for assessing the effectiveness of this legislation and the reasons for its further existence. The effectiveness of the legal status of a cooperating person under Section 209a of the Austrian Code of Criminal Procedure was thus limited from 1 January 2011 to 31 December 2016, and subsequently by a large amendment extended from 1 January 2017 to 31 December 2021.

3. The range of offences

At the beginning, it should be noted that it is necessary to distinguish, on the one hand, the category of offences clarified by using the crown witness institution, namely offences of third parties and, on the other hand, the category of offenses for which the crown witness or the cooperating accused can be prosecuted. The first category - offences being clarified - are, in principle, not considered common criminal offenses, but crimes of higher social importance, committed by secret, organized criminal groups, with a higher degree of conspiracy. This concerns primarily criminal activity committed by organized crime - drug, arms and human trafficking, corruption, money laundering, but also economic crime. The second category of offenses - offenses of which the crown witness may be accused - can be defined in the same or similar way (along with the related crime) as the first type, if the legislator prefers the concept where the crown witness is to clarify the criminal activity in which he or she participated, or does not have to be defined at all if, according to the concept chosen by the legislator, it does not matter whether the cooperating accused person is accused of the same or related criminal activity or entirely other criminal activity that is not related to the clarified crime. The second, more flexible, concept allows to treat any person who has information about a crime, no matter what crime he or she is accused of, as a crown witness. Of course, in practice, the occurrence of cases is more likely where the crown witness is accused of criminal activity that is identical or related, since the participation in criminal activity is a good prerequisite for obtaining sufficient information about it.

The Slovak Code of Criminal Procedure²⁰ exclusively lists the first category of offenses - crimes that can be clarified by this institution. The crown witness institution can be used to clarify corruption²¹, the crime of establishing, assembling and supporting a criminal group or crime²² committed by an organized group or criminal group²³ or terrorist crimes²⁴. The category of offenses is thus defined by exhaustive enumeration (crimes of corruption, terrorist offenses, establishment, assembly and support of a criminal group) and, secondly, by the general clause that it is any crime committed by an organized or criminal group. The second category of offenses, i.e. the crimes of the cooperating person, is not defined and therefore limited, since the crown witness can be accused of an identical or completely different offense and be consequently rewarded for cooperation by terminated or conditionally suspended criminal prosecution for that offence. Negative enumeration is not defined either, i.e. the exclusion of the application of the institution, if the crown witness is accused of some offences. However, the limitation concerns the way of participation in the criminal activity: as with a crown witness, it is not possible to cooperate with the crown witness, who is the organizer, abettor or client of the crime.

The Czech Code of Criminal Procedure, same as the Slovak legislation, only defines the first category of offenses. Crime is, same as in the Slovak legislation, a deliberate criminal offence, for which the Criminal Code defines criminal penalties with the upper limit exceeding five years.²⁵ Such a definition of the category of offenses in which the crown witness can be applied is clear, but to the detriment of the matter it is not possible to include in this category corruption crimes²⁶ and the misuse of public authority²⁷ in the essential facts of the case²⁸, the commentment of which is an accompanying phenomenon to the achievement of the objectives of organized crime considering the need of cooperation of the offenders with public authorities. However, the acceptance of a bribe can be clarified through a crown witness if the offender is an official, since in that case the offender can face a criminal penalty with the upper limit of ten years. The second category of offenses, i.e. the crimes of the cooperating person, is not defined, so same as in Slovak legislation, it is possible to work with a person as a crown witness if he or she is charged with any criminal offense. Contrary to the Slovak and Austrian legislation, Czech legislation explicitly excludes the application of this institution if serious injury or death is intentionally caused by the crime of the cooperating person. Similarly, to the Slovak and Austrian legislation, the application of this institution is excluded if the cooperating person is the client or abettor of a criminal offense. The Austrian Code of Criminal Procedure (StPO) defines a relatively wide range of offenses in which the institution of a cooperating person is applicable. The category of offenses is determined, on the one hand, by the jurisdiction of the courts and the public prosecutor's office (Section 209a (1) point 1 and 2 with reference to Section 31(2) and (3) and Section 20a and 20b and, on the other hand, by the specific enumeration of offenses (point 3). The institution of the cooperating accused, for example, can be applied to all offenses where the upper limit of criminal penalty exceeds five years, which, however, does not represent such a large range of offenses as in the case of the Czech Criminal Code or the Slovak Criminal Code, given the generally lower penalties in the StGB²⁹. However, the enumeration of offenses also includes a number of criminal offenses with lower criminal penalties (property crimes, corruption crimes³⁰, misuse of public authority and many others). Same as according to the Slovak legislation and unlike the Czech legislation, the crimes of corruption can be clarified by applying the crown witness institution.

The specificity of the Austrian legislation is the fact that the range thus defined applies to criminal offenses of third parties being clarified, to detect and convict their offenders, but also for criminal offences committed by the cooperating accused. Thus, unlike the Slovak and Czech legislation, a person can become the cooperating accused only if he or she has committed one of the specified criminal offenses or other criminal offense that is related to the organized criminal activity committed (... oder einer Tat, die mit einer solchen Verabredung, Vereinigung oder Organisation im Zusammenhang steht...). From the concept of «admitting one's own participation in a criminal offense» (... Geständnis ... über seinen Tatbeitrag ...) as well as from the concept of «supporting a broad clarification of any of the offenses referred to in points 1 to 3, which (note. clarification) exceeds one's own participation in a criminal offense» (... die umfassende Aufklärung einer in den Z 1 bis 3 genannten Straftaten über seinen eigenen Tatbeitrag hinaus zu fördern ...)³¹, it is clear that the legislator requests the cooperating accused person to be accused (suspect) of the same or related criminal offense that is being clarified. The same legal qualification is thus not sufficient since it must also concern the same offences (committed and clarified by the cooperating person) or the content-relative offences. In addition, as in the Slovak and Czech legislation, there is a restriction on the way of own participation in criminal activity: if the person had a leading role (position) in the commitment of a criminal offense, the application of the crown witness institution to that person is ruled out³². The leading role should be interpreted as the position of the organizer, abettor or the client, or even somewhat broader: the cooperation with the offender as a crown witness can theoretically be ruled out if such a person committed robbery with an accomplice, while the role or status of both in committing the offense was the same. At the same time, the law does not state a negative enumeration that would rule out the application of a crown witness in certain criminal offences.

²⁹ The author based this statement on his own experience of comparing criminal penalties in the relevant codes of criminal substantive law. However, an exhaustive analysis of this issue goes beyond the scope of this article. As an example (relevant in relation to the application of a crown witness), however, we can mention the criminal offense of establishment of and membership in a criminal group (Section 278 of the StGB), for which the imprisonment rate is set for up to three years. In the Slovak Republic, the criminal penalty for an adequate criminal offense (Section 296 of the Slovak Criminal Code) is between five and ten years and in the Czech Republic (Section 361 of the Czech Criminal Code) at the level of two to ten years.

Compared to the Slovak and Czech legislation, the range of offenses thus defined and the need for a connection between the criminal offence of the crown witness and a third party represent a significant restriction on the applicability of this institution. On the one hand, it is understandable that the cooperating person is able to provide the most comprehensive and highest quality information about the crime he or she participated in. On the other hand, a person accused of his or her own unrelated criminal activity may have significant knowledge of other criminal activity in which he or she did not participate. However, Austrian law does not allow the application of the institution of the cooperating person in such a case. From the point of view of the historical context of the crown witness institution, it can be noted that the Austrian model corresponds to the traditional application of the institution:

³² This follows from the provisions of Section 209a (5) point 2 of the StPO.

the crown witness clarifies the crime in which he or she participated³³. The Slovak and Czech model, which does not include the restriction, is more flexible and allows for wider application of the crown witness institution. On the other hand, it is possible to conclude that there is a potential danger of misuse of this legislation by the police or the prosecutor (public prosecutor's office). There may be a situation that a corruptly motivated prosecutor will want to award impunity to the accused person, so he or she provides this person with information about an unrelated case, subsequently putting that person in the status of the cooperating accused while terminating or conditionally suspending the criminal prosecution. In the Austrian model, where the criminal activity of the crown witness and the third party must at least be related, that situation could not occur even theoretically

4. Subsidiarity and proportionality

Subsidiarity of the application of the crown witness institution means that its application comes into consideration if the information necessary for the clarification of a criminal offense and the conviction of the offender cannot be obtained by other means of evidence. The implication of subsidiarity in this case is the prioritization of “standard” evidence, a means of proof which creates less of a doubt about its credibility.

The principle of proportionality can be understood in the case of a crown witness in two levels. The first level is manifested in the degree to which the cooperating person contributed to the clarification of the criminal offense and conviction of the offender, on the one hand, and the benefits that the cooperating person receives in return (termination of prosecution, waiver of punishment, award of lower sentence, etc.) on the other hand. The authorities applying this institution must therefore take into consideration the level of benefits to be received by the cooperating person in terms of the probative value of the information obtained and its impact on the outcome of the proceedings in which the cooperating person acts as a witness. The second level of the principle of proportionality is manifested in the social interest in the clarification of serious criminal offense committed by a third party and the conviction of that party on the one hand, and the interest in the prosecution of the cooperating person and his or her punishment, i.e. the relation of the nature and severity of the criminal offense to be clarified and the offense committed by the cooperating person. At this level, therefore, the law enforcement authority must consider whether the interest in the clarification of the crime and conviction of the offender is greater than the interest in imposing a penalty on the cooperating person.

Under the legal status in Slovakia, the law does not explicitly stipulate the subsidiarity of the application of the crown witness institution. Subsidiarity is only implicit, in the temporary suspension of criminal prosecution, subject to the condition that a different procedure (criminal charge against the cooperating person) would make it more difficult to clarify a serious crime. Similarly, in the Czech Code of Criminal Procedure, subsidiarity is implicit in the temporary suspension of criminal prosecution, when the legislator stipulates that the police authority proceeds in that way if necessary to clarify the crime in question. The Austrian StPO Code of Criminal Procedure does not regulate subsidiarity. Although the Slovak, Czech and Austrian Criminal Codes provide for subsidiarity only implicitly or not at all, its observance follows from the practical point of view: law enforcement authorities naturally prefer the means of evidence where the likelihood of successful rejection of their plausibility appears to be the lowest. This is reflected in the decision-making process of the supreme courts³⁴, or institutional courts³⁵ by emphasizing the equivalence of the evidence thus obtained in comparison with other evidence, stressing the fact that the cooperating person as a source of evidence cannot be refused per se.

In the legislations examined, the principle of proportionality is governed in a much more extensive and diversified manner. The Slovak legislation expressly regulates the proportionality in the understanding of the second level, thus stipulating³⁶ that the interest in the clarification of that serious crime is beyond the interest in criminal prosecution (for this or other criminal offence) against the cooperating person. The criteria used to assess the priority of the individual interests remain for the consideration of the prosecutor or the court, but this must be justified. The interest can be assessed according to the offenses committed (the cooperating person may be charged with another offense than the convicted offender), and also according to the different rates of participation in the offence, or the degree of completion of the offense.

The Czech legislation stipulates that the prosecutor applies the principle of proportionality even when deciding whether to designate the person as the cooperating accused in the prosecution. The judge is to assess the nature of the offense to be clarified by the testimony of the cooperating person, on the one hand, and the criminal offense which the cooperating person admits, in particular, the circumstances of the case, the share of the cooperating person in committing the offense, the consequences of the offense, i.e. the person as the offender on the other hand. Consequently, the public prosecutor must decide what benefits he proposes to be provided to the person cooperating in the prosecution. The public prosecutor may propose to the court to waive the punishment, while assessing the seriousness of the criminal offence committed by the cooperating person and the criminal offence that the cooperating person helps to clarify. The public prosecutor must then assess the nature of these criminal offences, taking into account the extent by which the cooperating person contributed to the clarification of serious criminal offence, the significance of his or her testimony to criminal proceedings with regard to other evidence. The law requires the public prosecutor to assess the necessity of the petition to waive the punishment in respect of these facts. The second level of proportionality is thus partly complemented by its first level.

The Austrian legislator determines the state prosecutor's office in deciding on the choice of procedure which leads to the suspension of criminal prosecution under reservation, to assess the extent to which the information provided has contributed or will contribute (das Gewicht des Beitrags) to the clarification of the criminal offence, on the one hand, and the nature and extent of the cooperating person's own participation in this offence on the other hand.

³⁶ Provisions of Section 215(3) of the Slovak CPC, Section 218(1) of the Slovak CPC.

Subsequently, the law determines the public prosecutor to assess whether or not it is necessary to punish the cooperating person with regard to the result of the assessment as well as with regard to the achievement of individual prevention and repression (permanent deviation from criminal activity), i.e. to assess whether the benefits provided are reasonable. In the Austrian legislation, the second level of the principle of proportionality thus overlaps with its first level.

5. Obligations of the crown witness

The essence of the crown witness institution is a contractual relationship between the state and the offender, the subject of which is the exchange of considerations. In view of the fact that the state is the “most trustworthy” party in that relationship whose authorities are obliged to act in order to achieve justice and only within the limits and in the manner laid down by the law, the cooperating person is obliged to fulfil first, i.e. to meet the obligation of providing testimony, for which the person subsequently receives an advantage or beneficial treatment. The fulfilment of the cooperating person may consist of a number of specified tasks, but the basic that each crown witness legislation counts with, is to provide information to clarify serious criminal activity or to convict its offender.

At the beginning, it should also be added that, in the interest of the smooth cooperation and legal certainty of the cooperating person, he or she must be informed of his or her duties and rights at first contact as well as of the possible consequences of the failure to fulfil his or her duties.

According to Slovak legislation,³⁷ the cooperating person is obliged to participate (by his or her testimony) in the clarification of a criminal offence or conviction of its offender to a significant extent. It follows from this notion that the evidence obtained by the testimony of the crown witness is not only to serve as a confirmation of the issue of fact well established by other evidence, but that this evidence appears to be a necessary condition for the conviction of the offender (criminal charges), as without its existence, the conviction of the offender (criminal charges) would be considerably more difficult or impossible, although it cannot be the only conclusive evidence³⁸. It also follows from the notion of clarification that the crown witness provides information that is new to the police and the prosecutor's office, and thus the confirmation of already-known information is insufficient. An option is permissible that the crown witness provides some new information and partially confirms the facts already known. Similarly, the notion of clarification does not apply to the provision of information that is merely a matter of assumptions and impressions. In addition to the obligation to disclose the facts in the pre-trial proceedings, the crown witness is also obliged to testify in the main proceedings against a third party. Exercise of the right to refuse testifying in the main proceedings against a third party, for example, due to the possibility of giving grounds for the person's own criminal prosecution, must be considered a breach of the duty of the crown witness, thereby losing the opportunity to gain an advantage in the proceedings on its own criminal case. This applies equally to all three legislations examined. The provision of information by which the crown witness significantly contributes to the clarification of the criminal offense, and the testimony in the procedural status of a witness exhausts the obligations of the crown witness under the Slovak legislation, which means that the Slovak legislation provides for the narrowest range of duties of the crown witness amongst the legislations examined.

According to Czech legislation,³⁹ the basic condition for obtaining the status of a cooperating person is the communication of facts to the public representative that can make a significant contribution to the clarification of a crime. The same applies to the significance of the facts as in the Slovak legislation. The cooperating person is also obliged to testify about these facts as a witness. According to Czech legislation, the admission of one's own criminal activity is one of the basic conditions for applying the status of the co-operating person. The cooperating accused is obliged to admit the offence for which he or she is prosecuted, and there is no reason to doubt that this confession was made freely, seriously and definitely. The admission thus must meet the attributes of a standard legal act, and there can be no reasonable doubt that these attributes are not met. Reasonable doubt is a rational doubt, and not any doubt invoked, for example, by other evidence found in the case.

According to Austrian legislation, the condition for treating a person as the cooperating person is the provision of his or her knowledge of facts or evidence that significantly contribute to the extensive clarification of a criminal offense (other than knowledge of the person's own participation in it) or to the identification of the person who participated in the commission of the offense as the leading actor. As with the Slovak and Czech legislation, the contribution of the crown witness must be significant. The Slovak and Czech legislation do not specifically mention the possibility of searching for or detecting the offender on the basis of the information provided, as this possibility is already contained in the notion of detection or conviction of the offender.

The legislation concerning the other duties of the cooperating person in different countries is characterized by significant differences. According to Czech and Austrian legislation, the cooperating person is obliged to admit to his or her own criminal activity, or his or her own participation in the criminal activity being clarified. According to Slovak legislation, the admission of crime by the cooperating person is not required.

According to Austrian legislation, the admission of participation in the criminal offence, by which the cooperating person expresses regrets over the crime committed (reumütiges Geständnis ... über seinen Tatbeitrag) is also a condition of the cooperation. The Austrian legislature thus requires a qualified confession: confession with regret, referring in the text of the law to the provision of Section 34(1) point 17 of the Austrian StGB, which considers such confession as one of the attenuating circumstances. An attenuating circumstance applies if the offender confesses to his or her own criminal activity and expresses regrets over it. However, it is not sufficient to apply the institution of a crown witness: in addition to the confession to one's own criminal activity, it is necessary to provide information about the criminal activity of other persons or information about the criminal activity in which the cooperating person participated himself or herself, as well as information about the activities of other participants. Admission of the person's own criminal activity or share in the criminal activity being clarified must be done on a voluntary basis, same as the person's entire cooperation with the public prosecutor's office. Enforcing the confession, although the person originally initiated the cooperation, would mean the violation of the nemo tenetur se ipsum accusare principle. In addition to the confession, however, Austrian law also requires another unique obligation: an initiative by the person interested in becoming a crown witness. This person is thus obliged, if he or she is interested in cooperation, to contact the public prosecutor's office, which cannot initiate such doing of the cooperating person as a crown witness ex officio. If the initiative is inadmissible on the part of the public prosecutor's office, the more (a fortiori) it is forbidden to force cooperation under pressure. Considering the initiative of the crown witness, the admission and regret of his or her crime, it is necessary to perceive this institution as an instrument to extend the possibilities of individualizing the punishment, which means, as we have already mentioned in the inroduction, a departure from the idea of negotiated justice, i.e. trade in justice. In Slovakia and the Czech Republic, the issue of the initiative is not legally regulated⁴⁰, according to Czech legislation, the consent of the cooperating accused to such a designation is sufficient⁴¹. In view of the absence of the requirement of the initiative by the cooperating person and the admission of his or her own criminal activity, the Slovak and Czech legislation can be viewed openly as rational and flexible but at the same time allowing opportunism by the cooperating person as well as by the prosecutor's office, which can in this way resolve the issue of insufficient evidence, through a “deal”, even on its own initiative

The other and last special obligation of the crown witness in Austrian legislation that does not exist in Slovakia and the Czech Republic, is compliance with the specially defined obligations that apply in the case of deviation. Thus laid down obligation may be the payment of a sum of money, the performance of generally beneficial works, or the performance of a probation period with appropriate limitations and obligations⁴². If not prevented by circumstances worthy of special consideration, the crown witness is also obliged to pay the damage incurred, or otherwise contribute to the elimination of the consequences of the offense⁴³.

The views that the obligation to detect criminal activity can also be applied to the detection of the crime of the cooperating person alone, are to be refused⁴⁴ - both for the legal wording and for the material aspect of the fact that the granting of impunity or award of a sentence below the statutory limit solely in return for the admission of one's own criminal activity is inappropriate. This applies equally to all three legislations examined.

⁴⁰ Practice in the Czech Republic shows that the cooperation initiative comes both from the accused as well as the state prosecutor's office. The accused in the initiator of the cooperation in 65 % of cases. 8. Conclusion

From the comparative examination of the legal provisions in question (historical context, context of adopting the legislation, range of offences, subsidiarity and proportionality, obligations of the crown witness) and the identification of their substantial differences, the following questions and subjects for reflections de lege ferenda arise.

Firstly, from a dogmatic point of view, is it permissible for a state whose right and duty is to prosecute crimes to conclude an agreement on cooperation with the perpetrator, the fulfilment of which will make the perpetrator non-punishable?

Although the legislation concerning the crown witness in Slovakia, the Czech Republic and Austria is identical in the purpose it follows, various attributes related to such person's status, duties, rights, applicability in various criminal offenses and other facts are different. The joint aim is, on the one hand, to effectively clarify serious crime, in particular organized crime, committed by sophisticated methods, with a higher level of conspiracy where standard criminal law procedures used to clarify crime lose efficiency and, on the other hand, to raise distrust among organized crime members and raise concerns that someone can always betray them by cooperating with the police. The crown witness instrument is a sign of the diversion of continental legal systems from the principle of seeking material truth and their tendency to efficiency and effectiveness - in the sense that it is better to convict criminals for the price of impunity of one of them than not to convict anyone, i.e. it is better to fulfil the obligation to prosecute crimes partially than not at all. Achieving the purpose of detecting serious crime is also reflected in the circumstances of the adoption of the relevant legislation in Slovakia, the Czech Republic and Austria. However, while the legislation of the crown witness is a stable part of the criminal procedure in the Slovak and the Czech Republic, the effectiveness of the legislation in Austria is limited in time, from 2011 to six years and from 2017 to five years, allowing for the regular evaluation of its legal application.

Secondly, what is the scope of clarified offenses of third parties to which the legislation applies?

The first significant difference in the three legislations examined can be found in the question of defining the categories of criminal offenses to which the crown witness legislation applies. Extensive application possibilities in terms of this attribute are provided by Austrian legislation where the range of offenses is determined by the jurisdiction of the courts and the public prosecutor's office: it covers all criminal offenses where the upper limit of the penalty rate exceeds five years (which, given the overall lower penalty rates in the Austrian StGB de, means fewer criminal offenses) but also the exhaustive enumeration of other criminal offenses. The Slovak legislation deals with crimes committed by organized crime, especially crimes committed by organized and criminal groups and, unlike the Czech legislation, includes all crimes of corruption and misuse of public authority. The Czech legislation permits the application of crown witness to intentional criminal offenses with an upper limit of criminal penalty exceeding five years, whereby in the case of corruption crimes, allowing only crimes of bribe acceptance by an official.

Thirdly, is it necessary to limit the range of criminal offenses of the crown witness, in which it is possible to apply the termination of criminal prosecution, the reduction of punishment or impunity as a reward for co-operation?

The Slovak and Czech legislation does not provide for such a limitation, whereas the Austrian legislation establishes a range of criminal offenses of the crown witness and a range of criminal offenses of a third party, which are clarified, where it is necessary that it concerns the same or at least related criminal activity. Austrian legislation is therefore the most restrictive on this issue. On the one hand, the absence of restrictions may represent the theoretical risk of abuse by the police and prosecutors: for example, a corruptly motivated prosecutor can provide a person with information about an unrelated crime, then puts him or her in the position of a crown witness and terminates prosecution for his or her own criminal activity, on the other hand, the absence of restrictions means more flexibility - wide scope of application of the crown witness institution.

Fourthly, is the admission of the crown witness regarding his or her own criminal activity necessary?

The admission of own criminal offense by a crown witness is a statutory condition for the institution to be applied in the Czech Republic and Austria, whereas it is not required in Slovakia. The Slovak legislation thus reduces the legal requirements to a minimum - clarifying the criminal activity of another person. The absence of the admission requirement supports the broad application of this institution, it is flexible, on the other hand, it allows the crown witness to say only what is in his or her view suitable to say regarding the crime of others. However, it should be noted that the public prosecutor's office must have its own knowledge of the criminal activity of the cooperating person, even without this person's admission of it, for example, to terminate the prosecution against this person. Thus, the admission of crime by the cooperating person is not a necessary legal requirement, but its absence supports the image of the institution as an institution promoting the trade in justice.

The following second part of the research will examine the issues that relate to the benefits provided to the cooperating person, which may be a reduction in punishment or even a cessation of prosecution. Another question under examination will be the possibility of using the statement of the cooperating accused as evidence.

Crown/Material witness in Central Europe: Slovak Republic, Czech Republic and Austria. Part 2.⁴⁵

The authors provide in the present second part of scientific research a detailed analysis of legislation of the crown witness in Slovak Republic, Czech Republic and the Republic of Austria. They focus on topics such as obligations of the crown witness or the ways how the information obtained from the cooperating person can be used as evidence. From analysis of the findings, authors recommend what factors the legislator should consider in legal regulation of the crown witness.

SUMMARY: 1. Introduction. - 2. Benefits provided to the crown witness. - 3. Information obtained by the examination of the cooperating person as evidence. - 4. Conclusion

1. Introduction

As discussed in the first part of the research, the main aim of the crown witness is to effectively clarify serious crime, in particular organized crime, committed by sophisticated methods, with a higher level of conspiracy and to raise distrust among organized crime members and raise concerns that someone can always betray them by cooperating with the police. To fulfill this purpose, the Slovak, Czech and Austrian legal regulations impose obligations on the cooperating accused in criminal proceedings against another person. However, the cooperating accused must also be positively motivated. Thus, the second part of the research deals with the issue of the positive motivation of the cooperating accused and the subsequent possibility of using his statement as evidence.

2. Benefits provided to the crown witness

The benefits provided to the crown witness form the legal consideration for fulfilling the duties, in particular providing information. These benefits are an instrument of positive motivation to cooperate with state authorities, unlike the situation of "ordinary" witnesses, who are obliged to testify about all the facts they know about the crime, i.e. unlike the situation of other persons, who may be penalized with criminal offenses in the event of failure to report selected criminal offenses.

The benefits provided to a crown witness may be more (termination of criminal prosecution or waiver of punishment) or less (award of a sentence below the lower limit of criminal penalty) pronounced and significant in the proceedings regarding the person's own criminal activity. The fact that the crown witness himself or herself is the perpetrator of a criminal offense, which requires the reaction of the society in the form of a sanction, i.e. the non-prosecution of the perpetrator of a criminal offence as a reward for information, constitutes a moral problem, does not speak in favour of providing significant benefits. In addition, the potential of a considerable reward – non-prosecution – may be a significant motivation to unlawfully testify about the criminal activity of a third party⁴⁶. On the other hand, the necessity to persuade a person to cooperate in cases of insufficient evidence, in particular in cases of organized and criminal groups, to persuade a person to betray his or her accomplices⁴⁷, speak in favour of providing significant benefits. In addition to the benefits presented, the enforcement of the witness protection legislation will normally be a significant advantage for the crown witness.

⁴⁷ Especially in cases where the cooperating person is aware that the information obtained from him or her constitutes to a great extent a decisive evidence, therefore, to convict the perpetrators conditio sine qua non, the person will be more willing to take the risk and not testify, as a result of which all members of the group will be released. In such cases, the motivation for the cooperating person should be as distinctive as possible. See: BUDAYOVÁ, Četnost využívání institutu spolupracujícího obviněného a návrhy k jejímu zvýšení (Frequency of Using the Cooperating Accused Institution and Suggestions for its Increased Application), Advocacy Bulletin, 2018, available at: <http://www.bulletin-advokacie.cz/cetnost-vyuzivani-institutu-spolupracujiciho-obvineneho-a-navrhy-k-jejimu-zvyseni> of 23 January 2018.

According to the legislation of the Slovak Republic and the Czech Republic, the primary possibility of "different treatment" of the cooperating person is the temporary suspension of the allegation under Section 205 of the Czech Code of Criminal Procedure, or the temporary suspension of criminal prosecution under Section 159b of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The imperative expressed in the purpose of the criminal codes (Section 1 of the CPC or Section 1 (1) the Czech CPC) - proper detection of criminal offenses and the fair and lawful punishment of their perpetrators) is implemented by the law enforcement authorities by applying the principles of legality and officiality; at the time when the facts found indicate a higher probability that the offense was committed by a particular person, by prompt criminal charge (that is, by initiating criminal prosecution against a particular person). However, this imperative is in such a situation exceptionally implemented in another way, by not applying the legality and officiality, but by delaying the criminal charge (initiation of criminal prosecution against a particular person), if the criminal charge would exclude the possibility of the cooperating person testifying as a witness, thus obstructing the appropriate detection of criminal activity and the legal and fair punishment of its perpetrators. In this sense, it can be concluded that the suspension of the allegation is an exception to the application of the principle of legality and officiality, which is otherwise implemented by prompt raising of criminal charge (or in the Czech Republic, by the initiation of criminal prosecution).

In the Austrian criminal procedure, there is no adequate legal institution for suspension of the criminal charge. It should be noted here that in the Austrian criminal procedure, unlike the Slovak or Czech legal status, a person does not get accused based on a formal decision, but on a material basis: the existence of a specific suspicion, an interrogation, performing other evidence or investigative tasks⁴⁸. The allegation against a person does not occur by a formal act, so its suspension cannot be ruled out based on the subject matter. The Austrian Code of Criminal Procedure, however, provides⁴⁹ that the application of the provision regarding the crown witness is also possible at the time when the suspect person is not yet accused.

The primary purpose of suspending the allegation (the initiation of criminal prosecution in the Czech Republic) lies in the fact that the suspected person does not become co-accused of a crime that he or she is to clarify, which means that he or she can testify in this case as a witness. Secondly, the non-prosecution of the cooperating person also has a psychological effect - it is a concession towards the person involved, the person is not in the position of the accused, which does not cause the negative effects of leading the prosecution against that person⁵⁰.

In the Slovak criminal procedure, following the application of the temporary suspension of the allegation, further procedure is applied. It should be noted here that the institute of suspended allegation is applied when no allegation has yet been made against the suspect who has the potential to become a cooperating person. If such a person has already been accused, consideration is given to the exclusion of the case for separate proceedings and the termination of criminal prosecution against that person (Section 228 (3) of the Slovak CPC) comes into consideration. After receiving a testimony (both in the pre-trial proceedings and in the court proceedings), the second stage of the procedure with the cooperating person follows in the conditions of the Slovak Republic: an allegation is promptly exhibited against this person and separate proceedings is conducted, applying one of the following institutions: termination of criminal prosecution under Section 215 (3) of the Slovak CPC, conditional suspension of criminal prosecution of the cooperating accused under Section 218 and 219 of the Slovak CPC⁵¹, which can be applied by the prosecutor in the pre-trial proceedings and later by the court, or extraordinary reduction of the punishment below the lower limit of criminal penalty under Section 39(2e) of the Slovak CPCs, which can only be applied by the court. The difference between the termination of criminal prosecution and the conditional suspension of criminal prosecution against the cooperating accused lies mainly in the time aspect of its application: prosecution can be terminated when the cooperating has already fulfilled all his or her duties (provided all information to help clarify the crime and convict the perpetrator, in the status of a witness), while the conditional suspension of criminal prosecution is applied when it is assumed that the cooperating person will continue to perform his or her duties, i.e. to provide information, to testify as a witness, and for that purpose the prosecutor sets a probation period of two to ten years for that person. At the end of the probation period, a testimonial is made on the basis of compliance with the terms of the cooperation. In deciding on the criminal case of the cooperating person, the prosecutor does not have to wait for the prosecution in the criminal case against a third party, or for the testimony of the crown witness in the main proceedings but can conditionally suspend the criminal prosecution and set a probation period.

In the Czech criminal procedure, the benefits provided to the cooperating person include the temporary suspension of criminal prosecution against the cooperating person and consequently, in the court proceedings, the waiver of punishment or the award of a sentence below the lower limit of criminal penalty, which may be proposed by the prosecutor in the prosecution (Section 178a (2) of the Czech CPC). Only the court is thus entitled to make the meritorious decision on the criminal matter of the cooperating person, the prosecutor only proposes the application of benefits. If the criminal case of a person as a potential crown witness is already at the stage of court proceedings and the person did not cooperate with the public prosecutor in the pre-trial proceedings, it is impossible to cooperate with such a person as a crown witness in the court proceedings, as for the cooperation in the court proceedings it is necessary that the public prosecutor designates the person as the cooperating accused already in the pre-trial proceedings, i.e. proposes the application for the waiver of punishment or the award of a sentence below the lower limit of the penalty rate³². Extraordinary reduction of the penalty below the lower limit of the penalty rate³³ is a standard tool for motivating the cooperating person. The waiver of punishment³⁴ as a motivation of the cooperating person is a special solution characteristic for the Czech legislation. In the case of the waiver of punishment, the court declares the perpetrator to be guilty, but does not award a sentence. The advantage of such a solution is indeed the fact that the punishment is not awarded, but the court may impose a protective measure (e.g. protective treatment, confiscation of things, etc.) Under the Slovak or Austrian legislation, such a procedure in the termination of criminal prosecution is not possible. In addition to the waiver of punishment of the cooperating person, the court in the Czech Republic may also decide on the conditional waiver of punishment⁵⁵, in which the court determines a probation period during which the crown witness is required to meet his or her duties related to the provision of information. Such a solution means an alternative to the conditional suspension of criminal prosecution in Slovakia, and the termination of criminal prosecution under reservation in Austria. The advantage of this solution is the possibility of imposing a protective measure, but the disadvantage is that the case can solely be decided by the court, which means more time consumption and burden on the court.

³² This fact is criticized as an obstacle to the wider application of the institution since the accused may potentially decide to cooperate later on. See: REHÁČEK, Mlčetí zlato aneb spolupráci se státním zástupcem k přísnějšímu trestu (Silence is Gold or a Stricter Punishment for Cooperation with the Public Prosecutor), Trestněprávní revue 2016, Volume. 15, No. 2, p. 44-46.

In the Austrian criminal procedure, the provisions on deviations apply. If the cooperating person has requested this, he or she has information that can support the clarification of the criminal offense, i.e. conviction of the perpetrator, confesses to the commitment of his or her own criminal activity, and such a procedure is sufficient for the fulfilment of individual prevention, the prosecutor's office imposes the obligation⁵⁶ on such a person to meet the duties according to the provisions on deviation and the obligation of further cooperation with the public prosecutor's office (provision of information, testimony in the procedural status of a witness). After meeting all the obligations imposed, the public prosecutor's office will terminate the criminal prosecution against the cooperating person. If these conditions are not met (in particular, the absence of the presumption of individual prevention, but also others), the public prosecutor's office will, in the course of the next proceedings (in the filing of the indictment), propose to impose a punishment below the lower limit of the penalty rate⁵⁷. Thus, in the Austrian criminal procedure, two advantages are applied towards the crown witness: the termination of criminal prosecution or, if the court decides after the filing of allegation, the award of a sentence below the lower limit of the penalty rate. Such a model of the application of the benefits is similar to the Slovak criminal procedure, which allows the application of the termination of criminal prosecution, or the conditional suspension of criminal prosecution and the award of a sentence below the lower limit of the penalty rate. The specificity of the Austrian model lies in the possibility of continuing with the already suspended criminal prosecution, since the public prosecutor's office suspends the criminal prosecution under reservation. This model of the termination of criminal prosecution thereby comes close to the legislation of the conditional suspension of criminal prosecution of the cooperating accused in Slovakia. After the suspension of criminal prosecution under reservation in the Austrian criminal procedure, it is possible to continue with the criminal prosecution against the cooperating person if the accused violates his or her obligation to cooperate, i.e. the information provided does not make a significant contribution to the clarification of the crime or conviction of the perpetrator, or if it was provided only to cover the person's leading role in a criminal group. The facts which the crown witness does not cause, such as the termination of criminal prosecution against a third party due to insanity, or the limitation of criminal prosecution³⁸, cannot be held against the crown witness. The public prosecutor's office must decide on the continuation of the prosecution within 14 days of the delivery of the decision terminating the criminal prosecution in the criminal case against the third party, which the cooperating person has clarified. Compared to this, in the Slovak Republic, the cooperating person has in the case of a conditionally suspended criminal prosecution a set probation period, during which he or she is obliged to provide information that will significantly contribute to the clarification of the offense, or the conviction of the perpetrator. If the cooperating person meets his or her duties, the prosecutor decides on a testimonial with the res iudicata effect; otherwise, it will decide to continue the prosecution.

An important issue in relation to the provision of benefits to the cooperating person in criminal proceedings is the question of the obligation or the volition of the law enforcement authorities or the court to apply these benefits, that is, the question of the obligatory or facultative nature of their application. The historical development of the crown witness institution has noted changes in the Anglo-American legal environment on this issue - while initially after the third party's conviction, the crown witness had the right to the termination of the proceedings against him or her, the newer legislation did not establish such a right: the judge was to consider whether to convict or release the witness³⁹.

The Slovak legislation is construed as exclusively facultative: the temporary suspension of the allegation, the termination of criminal prosecution against the cooperating accused, the conditional suspension of the criminal prosecution against that person, or the award of a sentence below the lower limit of the penalty rate apply solely on the discretion of the court or law enforcement authority. This stems from the formulation of legal provisions⁶⁰.

Compared to this, in the Czech Republic, the application of the provisions on the cooperating accused, the extraordinary reduction of punishment and the waiver of punishment is mixed: both facultative and obligatory, even following the amendment of this institution in 2012. The designation of a person as the cooperating accused and the proposal for extraordinary reduction of punishment below the lower limit of the penalty rate or the waiver of punishment is carried out on the facultative basis by the public prosecutor, at his or her own discretion concerning the fulfilment of the legal conditions⁶¹. Subsequently, however, in deciding on the waiver of punishment of a person who has been identified as the cooperating accused and for whom the prosecutor has proposed it, in compliance with the statutory conditions, the court obligatory applies⁶² the waiver of punishment of the person without having space for its own discretion. The Czech legislator has chosen this model to more strongly motivate the persons⁶³, who have information about the crime, to ensure them that after they meet the legal conditions and the public prosecutor proposes the waiver of their punishment, the benefits will actually be provided to them, after a strong criticism from the application practice⁶⁴. The peculiarity of this model is the fact that the public prosecutor has a room to decide at his or her discretion, twice: when deciding on designating a person as the cooperating accused, and then when proposing an extraordinary reduction of the sentence or a waiver of punishment, while such a room for discretion is not provided to the court. Such a model, where there is a room for discretion of the prosecutor's office and subsequently not for the discretion of the court, differs from the general concept of the status of the subjects of criminal proceedings, in which the prosecutor is, in principle, obliged to file an allegation, if the legal conditions for another procedure are not met, and consequently the court has a legal obligation to decide at its own discretion on the guilt and punishment. Narrowing the room of the court for its own discretion when awarding a sentence can raise doubts about the compliance of such a solution with the requirement to award appropriate penalties, as well as the principle of the traditional threefold separation of power, and thus the principles of the rule of law⁶⁵. The Czech legal situation can be criticized in the sense that when the court is already obliged to apply the proposed institution, the public prosecutor's obligation should also be stipulated (if the legal conditions are met, i.e. the duties of the cooperating person) to select one institution and to propose its application to the court, because the public prosecutor may ultimately decide in the present legal status not to propose any of the benefits to the cooperating person, thus contradicting the original intention of the legislator to strengthen the motivation of crown witnesses to cooperate.

From the point of view of the obligatory and facultative nature of the benefits provided to the cooperating accused, the Austrian legislation may also be considered mixed, albeit in a different way. If the conditions are met, the public prosecutor's office is, in principle, obliged to treat the suspected person (without the status of the accused person) as the crown witness,⁶⁶ unless it is clear from the beginning that these conditions cannot be met (e.g. the information is not sufficient for the significant clarification of crime). The public prosecutor's office has the possibility to consider the fulfilment of the conditions, even though the legislator restricts the room for consideration (evident facts). If the person is already in the position of the accused, the public prosecutor's office is again obliged to apply the procedure according to the deviations - to impose an obligation on the accused to provide the service, or to provide further information on crime and the perpetrator if the assumptions are met⁶⁷. After compliance with the obligations, as stipulated to the cooperating person, the public prosecutor's office is obliged to terminate the prosecution⁶⁸. However, if the assumptions are not met (e.g. the information is insufficient), the public prosecutor's office continues to prosecute the cooperating person, while obliged to propose to the court an extraordinary reduction of the sentence below the lower limit of the penalty rate according to Section 41a of the Austrian StGB. The court then has the facultative possibility to apply this institution, i.e. it is at the discretion of the court to consider the contribution of the cooperating person to the detection of criminal activity and the conviction of its perpetrators, and to impose a fair punishment, taking into account the cooperation. The Austrian system of applying institutions conferring an advantage for the cooperating person is mostly obligatory, as far as the activity of the public prosecutor's office is concerned, the exception is only the procedure of the court, which is facultative. If all the conditions are met, this system gives the cooperating person the legal right to receive an advantage, so it guarantees its legal certainty. Compared with the Czech Republic, the system, if initiated towards the cooperating person at the court proceedings, is set up opposite: the prosecutor in the Austrian criminal procedure obligatory proposes and the court facultatively applies, taking into account its own discretion. This model corresponds to the traditional concept of the court as the authority with broadest discretionary power, broader than is the discretionary power of the public prosecutor's office.

7. Information obtained by the examination of the cooperating person as evidence

The question of using the cooperating person's testimony as evidence in proceedings against a third party is identical in all the legislations examined, in particular on the basis of the influence of the decision-making process of the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR). The information obtained by the examination of the cooperating person has no higher probative value (although the "crown" attribute would be likely to lead to such a presumption), but a priori it also has no lower probative value than the information obtained from other evidence. However, the evidence obtained by the examination of the cooperating person must be carefully assessed on its own, particularly in terms of consistency between individual testimonies given by the cooperating person, i.e. from the point of view of the credibility of the person himself or herself (e.g. with regard to his or her current or previous criminal activity, for example regarding his or her position in the criminal group, etc.) and, on the other hand, in the context of other evidence obtained, either confirming or negating the content of the cooperating person's testimony. Because of the need to assess this evidence in the context, therefore, the information obtained by the examination of the cooperating person cannot be the sole evidence proving the perpetrators guilty of committing criminal activity⁶⁹. Several factors may affect the veracity of the cooperating person's testimony. Both the cooperating person and the convicted offender are motivated to achieve the greatest possible benefit as part of their standing in criminal proceedings. If these persons participated in joint criminal activity, both sides will try to marginalize their own share in committing the crime and highlight the decisive or key role of the other party in committing the crime. In cases, where the cooperating person and the convicted offender have committed a joint criminal offense but also in cases where the cooperating person is (or is to be) accused of other - unrelated crimes, the veracity of his or her testimony may be influenced by another factor: the effort to ingratiate with the law enforcement authorities and the court for the benefits granted, as a result of which the testimony may include fables that have not actually taken place.

The ECHR has repeatedly expressed its opinion on the applicability of the information obtained from the crown witness. The approach of the ECHR to the crown witness institution, which is essentially positive, corresponds to the considerable expansion of this institution in the legal systems of the European countries⁷⁰, i.e. the fact that it is not just a singular phenomenon of one legal system⁷¹.

⁶⁹ See Ruling of the Supreme Court of the Czech Republic, file No. 7 Tdo 1315/2012 of 12 December 2012, Available at <https://www.nsoud.cz/> : «The given evidence cannot stand alone.»

⁷⁰ See the Resolution of the Constitutional Court of the Czech Republic, file No. III. CC 859/13 of 13 March 2014: «In many foreign criminal laws, this institution is currently included and considered to be an extraordinary but nevertheless a legitimate means of combating serious crime. The legal foundation of the institution of the cooperating accused (under such names as Kronzeuge, informant defendant, świadek koronny, pentito, testimone di giustizia, immunity witness, accomplice witness, supergrass apod.) can also be found, e.g. in Slovakia (establishment by an amendment of the Criminal Law and Criminal Procedure Code by Act No. 457/2003 Coll.), in Germany (Section 46b of the StGB), in Poland [Art. 2 ustawy o świadku koronnym z dnia 25. czerwca 1997 r. (Dz. U. z 1997 r. Nr 114, note. 738)], in Italy (La legge 13 febbraio 2001 n. 45) and in a number of other countries. The application of this institution and its incorporation into the legal systems of the Member States are also recommended by the Council of Europe documents [Recommendation Rec(2005)9 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the protection of witnesses and collaborators of justice].»

The question of applicability of the accusative or inquisitional type of the criminal procedure in individual countries, i.e. pointing to the fact that the crown witness was not the original institution used in continental legal systems, is no longer relevant. Essential is only the observation of the rules of fair trial⁷². The ECHR allows the use of witness testimony of the cooperating person, i.e. its application is not violation of the right to a fair trial per se under Art. 6 of the Convention. Similarly, it is generally permissible to base the conviction judgment on a single conclusive evidence or a decisive factor (conclusive evidence)⁷³. However, the combination of these factors (witness testimony of the crown witness as conclusive evidence) is a reason for thorough examination of the fairness of the process under Art. 6 of the Convention. The ECHR accepted the possibility of witness testimony of the crown witness as conclusive evidence of significant importance. Proof given by the testimony of a crown witness must be carried out in the adversary procedure in accordance with Art. 6 (3d) Article 3 d) f the Convention. The court concludes that the use of testimonies given by the cooperating persons may jeopardize the fairness of the trial, since the veracity of the testimony may be affected by the intention to obtain personal benefits or revenge against the accused. However, the fairness of the trial is preserved if the law enforcement authorities and the court are aware of these risks and carry out an in-depth and thorough analysis of the veracity and reliability of the testimony of the cooperating person and pay special attention to the objections raised by the third party's defence, the elements of adversary procedure⁷⁴ are applied, that is if the evidence obtained by the witness statement of the cooperating person is supported by further evidence⁷⁵. Although the information obtained from the cooperating person may be sufficient for the initiation of criminal prosecution or the filing of an allegation, for further proceedings - prolongation of the period of detention, and more so for the prosecution and conviction of the accused - there is a need for further evidence of the accused⁷⁶.

A particular issue is the admissibility of the use of information obtained by the testimony of the crown witness as a proof in proceedings against the crown witness himself or herself. We take the view that the procedure would be contrary to the principle of nemo tenetur ipsum accusare, as different rules apply to the examination of the witness than to the examination of the accused - the witness is unlike the accused obliged to speak only the truth, not to withhold anything, and only able to refuse to testify in statutory situations. Therefore, if prosecution is subsequently pursued against the witness, it is necessary to hear the information about his or her own criminal offense in the procedural position of the accused.

8. Conclusion

From the comparative examination of the legal provisions in question (benefits provided to the crown witness, possibility of using his statement as evidence) and the identification of their substantial differences, the following questions and subjects for reflections de lege ferenda arise.

Firstly, what form of benefits is necessary or permissible to motivate the crown witness to cooperate?

On the one hand, the crown witness is also a perpetrator of a criminal offense and there is a social interest in imposing a sanction for the commitment of the offense (i.e. the non-prosecution of the crown witness as a perpetrator constitutes a moral problem), or the possibility of gaining a significant benefit may motivate to false testimony of the criminal activity of third parties; on the other hand, the benefit provided to the crown witness must be sufficient motivation to cooperate with the prosecutor's office, and to break the criminal alliance. When looking for an ideal model of benefits, it is also necessary to take into account the fact that the advantage in the form of stopping prosecution with the effects rei iudicatae must be provided only after the fulfilment of all duties by the crown witness, in Slovakia, in the form of stopping the prosecution after the fulfilment of the duties or the temporary suspension of criminal prosecution with a probation period for the fulfilment of the duties, or in Austria, in the form of stopping the prosecution, subject to its possible continuation. Similarly, in the Czech Republic, the court decides to waive punishment or impose a penalty below the lower limit of the penalty rate until the true when a decision is being made whether to prolong detention pending trial. While a suspect may validly be detained at the beginning of proceedings on the basis of statements by penitenti, such statements necessarily become less relevant with the passage of time, especially where no further evidence is uncovered during the course of the investigation."

crown witness has fulfilled its duties. The advantage of the Czech model, in which only the court decides on the criminal case of the crown witness is the fact that, even if the punishment is waived, it is possible to impose another sanction: protective measures, protective treatment. The advantage of the Austrian model lies in the explicit duty of the public prosecutor to decide whether to stop the prosecution or to file a prosecution and to propose a lower sentence, which allows the court to consider the possible need to impose a punishment in order to achieve individual prevention and repression of the crown witness.

Secondly, do benefits need to be applied on an obligatory or only facultative basis?

The facultative provision of benefits to the crown witness allows a greater scope for consideration of the prosecution, the public prosecutor's office or the court on the appropriateness of granting an advantage; on the other hand, the obligatory provision of benefits means a legal right to a reward for cooperation, and thus legal certainty and consequently more motivation for the crown witness. The Slovak model of legislation is based on the facultative provision of benefits to the crown witness. The Czech model is mixed: the prosecutor of the court facultatively proposes to waive from punishment or impose a penalty below the lower limit of the penalty rate, and the court, after compliance with the statutory conditions, decides to impose these benefits on an obligatory basis. The paradox of this model is that an independent and impartial court, which is the only one authorized to decide on the guilt and punishment, is given a narrower room for discretion than the public prosecutor's office. The reason for this limitation of the discretion of the court is precisely the provision of legal certainty to the crown witness. The Austrian model is mixed as well, but vice versa: the prosecutor's office obligatorily stops the prosecution, or obligatorily (after failing to comply with all the conditions) proposes the imposition of a penalty below the lower limit of the penalty rate, on which the court then has the facultative option to decide. The court has a mandatory obligation, after compliance with the legal conditions, to decide to stop the prosecution if the crown witness institution is applied only during the main proceedings.

Thirdly, what kind of probative value and what effect on conviction does the information obtained from the crown witness have in the proceedings against a third party?

Using the information obtained from the crown witness as evidence against a third party involves several risks related to truthfulness and credibility: marginalization of one's own share or the leading role in the commitment of crime, fabrication of events and facts that did not actually take place, or false information about third parties as offenders in an attempt to increase one's own status as a witness and to achieve greater benefits for oneself, and so on. The decision-making process of national courts and the European Court of Human Rights addresses this issue by emphasizing a careful and in-depth analysis of the truthfulness and credibility of the testimony given by the crown witness, as well as by emphasizing the need to support this testimony with other evidence. The application of a crown witness does not imply per se violation of the right to a fair trial under Art. 6 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, i.e. the information obtained from the crown witness does not have a lower probative value than the information obtained from other evidence. Information obtained from the crown witness may represent decisive proof of the third party's guilt, but not the only conclusive evidence. It is questionable whether the testimony of the crown witness without finding any further information (without finding any further evidence) would be enough to raise an allegation or to initiate criminal prosecution against a third party as the accused. Once these issues have been resolved, it can be assumed that the legislation concerning the crown witness will be balanced and effective in any country.
